Importance of Mentoring Picture This

What is wrong in this picture? there is a worker who is trying to complete his job, but he is putting himself in risk which probably might end in a fall injury or even in a fatality.

Having a mentor at work can traditionally be seen as senior and more experienced employees giving advice and support to younger employees earlier on in their careers.

It is important to have good mentoring programs in the workplace specially for individuals who are just starting their career, a mentor can help set guidelines on professional expectations. They may clarify the priorities of the role and proper workplace behaviors. These guidelines can help the mentee establish appropriate work habits that enable them to focus and perform their job successfully. These effective work habits can help them be more productive and impress their supervisors.
